Predictive Services Discussion:

Well above normal, record-setting temperatures will continue in the Southwest, but temperatures will be a few degrees cooler in the northern half of the West, with the modestly cooler temperatures continuing in California. Above normal temperatures will also continue in the Plains into the Appalachians. The airmass will remain quite dry for much of the Great Basin, central/southern Rockies, Southwest, and High Plains as minimum relative humidity falls to 5-20%, with minima of 12-30% for the Plains into Appalachians and Deep South. Higher relative humidity generally near or above 20% is expected in California, the Northwest, and northern Rockies. Breezy and dry southwesterly winds will spread across much of the Great Basin into Wyoming creating areas of elevated conditions. Breezy northwesterly winds will develop in North Dakota into western Minnesota, while locally breezy southerly winds develop on the central and southern Plains.

Much of the US will be dry today, with little to no precipitation forecast. However, heavy rain will fall across portions of central and northern as Hurricane Milton moves off the coast. Strong winds are also likely to continue through the day in Florida and portions of the Southeast abating overnight, with elevated fire weather conditions possible in Georgia due to the stronger winds and dry conditions on the northwest side of the storm.
